

THE ELIMINATIONIST

As I have decided to expunge the rest of my book that I have set to release, I have come to the conclusion that the topics covered were relevant but irrelevant to the current process of thought. If God wanted that book to be erased, I would've never written it. It will be released in the future but there is no point in continuing that, so it has been shortened to an essay. No, instead of Hell, I will be speaking on nothing. Good. I thought there would be no point in writing about the Devil or God. In fact, I think there is no point in thinking at all. Once, I asked a man how did he gain his wealth and he replied; "Just work hard". There wasn't any irrelevant, long-winded, monologue about social responsibility, superstition, markets, personal engagement and all. There was a simple answer. And as time goes on, I am beginning to think that no thought goes into anything. People are becoming irreligious, carrying less and giving more (to the system) and marching obediently towards the status quo. Is minimalism a relevant thought? Motionless and formless as Sun Tzu suggested in Law #48 or the 'laws of power'? If there is no thought as opposed to some, would that eliminate all unnecessary and dark thoughts? If so, is it worth it? Not really, it isn't a good thing to destroy individuality just for the sake of a few bad apples. Science and religion has battled in the USA, and as a resident I can say that perceivably science is king. More people think less around religion and more around logic, principle, reason and rationality. Reality is essentially what we make it. Christianity is a dead language. Language as in what we speak and our understand of it. If Christianity was truly dominant in America, then the people would not be conformists to the Devil's will, and this depends on who exactly you believe the Devil is. If we are speaking on a secular level, then this must be the one who sits upon the highest mountain of skulls. This will be the Government and his accomplices; the military. The military of any country has slaughtered many people over reasons, commonly known to us are poor and sour. Sour and foul for a person to murder or even justifiably kill some. So is the military Christian or still Christian after the Syrian massacre and half a million casualties in Iraq? Arguably no, if we go by conventional thought by John 3:16 "God is Love". Is love the sadistic execution of your 'enemies' by putting them in concentration camps? Or the placement of people in Guantanamo Bay, a absolutely horrific torture site? No, absolutely not. The American Christianity is so often hypocritical. Is a figure like Tyler, the Creator worthwhile destroying for his rather lewd stance towards Christianity? Strange how I brought up the celebrity, but in this book I will speak all about Hollywood and the High Life. I even have an entire section dedicated to the wealthy lifestyle; the New Aristocrat. For example; Cardi B, Kanye West, Lil Wayne, Kim Kardashian, et. al are all Christians or Catholic. How? And if so, what makes the Atheist worse or better than the Christian? Is talking about lewd sex, stripping, calling yourself a 'God', 'Yeezus', so on and so forth Christian? In a similar style how Three 6 Mafia were or are pastors, where is the line we draw to say; 'Oh, that's not Christian!' Is Madonna a Catholic after the 'Like a Prayer' video? The way how us Americans view Christianity is interesting, because someone like Adolf Hitler could gain salvation for his sins in repentance meanwhile someone whom has no belief in any God will be ostracized. This is a terrible social stigma put upon people and I think is part of one of the reasons why the suicide rate in America is skyrocketing to the 10th leading cause of death and possibly the 1st as the life expectancy will increase but the quality of life will dramatically decrease. If you really think about it we are dependent upon the system and other people. We are not independent autonomous beings, therefore we are not free and this is a growing cancer/tumor in the face of America leading to the most complicated existential crises of all time. Let me tell you, it is a goddamn soap opera. People will commit suicide over failure, even though life is not a relaxing experience. I call it, first world problems. People are not able to live with themselves being, criminals, scum, sinners, outcasts, failures, etc. etc. And to be frank, the way this society is set up why wouldn't you give up the ghost after realizing that essentially you are screwed? But I think pessimism is a narrow line of thought, doesn't lead anywhere. To look at your situation as one dimensional, why not look at it as a opportunity? Perhaps you could be a anarchist? Or a revolutionary? Personally, I am in a more fortunate situation, with some unfortunate circumstances regarding some minor issues. I don't think those issues are unstoppable however. Maybe I'm wrong though. But I am opportunistic with a drive and a passion to do things so I don't overthink defeat. It is a concern, but not a worry. There is a sort of maximalist expressionism among the Abrahamic religions however. Lots of worrying and overthinking defeat. Perhaps the Devil may destroy your blessings. I understand living life stress-free is a impossibility in today's society, if you so choose to live in it. But there is no point in throwing away the only way to achieve happiness in a society where happiness is a fleeting thought and that is to not care. About anything. If you thought about this, there is no way to worry about anything if you do not worry about it. You will fail. I have already established there has to be an loser. This is a game we are playing and like football, there can only be one winner and one loser. There is no losers and no winners, and if it's a draw then there is a rematch. Life indeed is a endless rematch. With heavy losses, one may commit suicide. But the threat of purgatory is a issue worthy of never doing it, as in the eyes of Man. To be frank, I don't care. I know practically, the end of the world is coming, possibly sooner than I can imagine. However, I still make motions into things that could lead to my success. Despite the odds. As the world is decomposing before our eyes, there is a certain shadow of myself telling me that essentially it all doesn't matter in the end. Maybe that is correct. After all, if the end is near, and there is nothing you can do about it, why spend time worrying about it? If I had a crystal ball and knew I was going to fail; I would still party like it's 1999. I am not a hedonist but until you people clean your act up, I matter wise do what I need to do and do what I want. I do selfless acts more and more, and give things away because I know I probably won't be here anymore. At least, my actions of kindness would be remembered immortally, lasting for a long time. However it doesn't necessarily mean that I will become a vegan, or a Christian or even a Satanist. There is nothing motivating me to follow anything. I honestly do not see the point in opulence and its struggling journey towards it but I also don't see the point in facing adversity and poverty purposefully for salvation as some Catholics practice. I remembered pointing this out in my prior writings that if Nihilism is true and there is no God or even if Satanism is true; there really isn't any justifiable reason to be a complete degenerate neither. I mean it's tempting but why waste time doing pointless Good and pointless Bad/Evil? I don't have time to do all the drugs, have lewd sex with all of the women, rob the poor and give to the rich, hurt innocent people, etc. I have some ideas I would like to execute before I walk down the road of nihilistic destruction. Neither do I have time to drink from the cup of Jesus and walk down the path of righteousness, facing the most absurd struggles and disabilities I have ever experienced and being forever tested by God and haunted by demons. These two paths are terrifying in their own way. But it seems the world is going with the former and becoming Evil by nature, participating in the most grotesque and perverse evils of all time. I cannot say that any of the dopamine filled juvenile corrupted hedonism is worth a damn. That's a enigma, because technically it's death but enrichs the corrupt. I am not a devil worshipper, but I am but a little man with a guitar, a dirt bike and a sleeping bag. That's the way I perceive myself. I don't identify with cults. The whole monetary system is a cult. I don't believe in Government but I do what I need to do and be a 'reasonable citizen.' Whatever that means and to the best of my ability. I never understood fetishism until I closely observed the surreal boundaries of existence we are forced to live in and also the abuse of children. I should watch myself here, because any words could be presumptuous and offensive so I will phrase this in respects; the trauma of today is the fetish of tomorrow. I was reading an extremely bizarre article from Old Dominion University, that the sexual of being raped is the most common sexual fantasy for women. Also a 1988 study by Pelletier and Herold that over half of their female respondents had fantasies of rape. That's insane. For once only I thought that the human species ending now becomes a certainty rather than a possibility. Eyes Wide Shut is true. Yet again I repeat myself by stating that essentially there is nothing you can do about it but you can do something for yourself, this frame of mind is reductionist in nature. I wouldn't have a issue with ontological reductionism as there truly isn't complexity in existence. You could overcomplicate things but that will become so muddled that even a genius would be challenged. The eliminationist is a denier of existence. Is the denial of existence an adequate counterargument to the objectivist? Is the Count Nothing spoken of in Victor Hugo's Les Miserables a reasonable point of view? After all we live in these artificial environments, in this artificial Hell. We create our own miseries, when there are none. Really we could escape the shame, doubt, fear, limitation, oppression, and dreadfulness by improving or at least trying to improve despite the possibility to fail. Should we live in the masochistic bondage of failure and fear of failure? Why become frail and weak when the sun is out? Why let fear rule us? Wake up and smell the coffee. You are not going to Hell, because you sinfully thought about another woman. And if so, as I said before, is there a thing you could actually do about it? We live in this concrete jungle, full of all sorts of perversities and those who are the most strong, fast, moral, beautiful, and the such fall right through the cracks. It is social darwinism and artificial selection at its finest, only the most adaptable will win this war of artificial Hell. The will to power so to speak. Achievement, ambition, and the striving to reach the highest possible position in life. We are prisoners in our own jails, being our own wardens, and administering our own punishments. The prison isn't physical, it's in our minds. We may think that one moment and find out that none of what we were saying was true. Delusion. Hallucination. Life, and more so the status quo, is like a woman with her fingertips running through her hair. She treats herself like a God, but is a mere mortal. She wants you to worship her but she never cares about you, you are the table and she puts her feet on you. You are all servants of the Devil. This demon feasts upon your life energy like a psychic vampire, always asking for more and more and is still not enough. People tend to think along the lines of a Certain Man but this Certain Man is a wrong man and a impossible one. Social organization between entities, things, persons and objects. 'The Organization Man' is valid, the average American subscribes to a collectivist ethic rather than the prevailing notion of rugged individualism. This has countless consequences. People are not able to live with themselves if they are not considered to be accepted in contemporary society. The Certain Man knows he must comply with rules and boundaries of social organization and his artificial environment. But what is certain? Isn't your entire existence indrenched in the Matrix? The illusion of choices? Gaslighting? No one can ultimately withstand the cold existence of a automation, a programmed machine. Even mind-controlled humans become obsolete, or rebel against their masters. No one can be the perfect Man or Woman, with all of the glamour and glory. The fame and fortune, the brains and bronze, the loved and most loving. Why try? If you absolutely knew you could, then you would've become that by now. You cannot because of human limitation. Our limitations is what makes us. Our achievements, our obedience, our words of flattery. But it doesn't matter. For these who will repeat the sadomasochistic cycle, good luck. I only wish that you would see what path of destruction you are heading down. I do however, have much respects for the man who has suffered through it. Despite his pleasure and enjoyment in it. Similar to the Dark Ages where Man whipped themselves for each sin they have done and delighted in their righteous judgment on themselves, as I say again; you are punishing yourselves.
